Combigerm

“A FINELY-CALCULATED INVESTMENT”

Recently settled on the EARL family farm, Bruno Vanpeperstraete must calculate each of his investments as closely as possible. He has announced his intention to buy a Franquet Combigerm. The Vanpeperstraete-Duquesne EARL cultivates 170 ha in the Nord department. 35 ha are devoted to potatoes, 12 ha to sugar beets and the rest to cereals and oilseed rape.

Why have you chosen the Franquet Combigerm?

“I wanted a versatile cultivator to replace the one I had been using, which was only capable of preparing the soil for sugar beets. I therefore chose the 5-metre Combigerm. Its width suits the power of my 150 hp tractor very well. I had also heard many good reports from satisfied users.”

What are the advantages of this implement?

It is remarkably capable of adapting to various types of soil preparation. It can work on the surface for sugar beet seedbeds but also at greater depth for potatoes. The Combigerm turns out to be easy to adjust even by persons who are poorly acquainted with the machine or when it is used on heterogeneous soils.

Besides, it is a simple machine without bearings. Its running costs are economical and it is easy to maintain. It also folds up efficiently and therefore does not take up too much room in the shed.

In conclusion, what is your overall opinion of this machine?

I am pleased with my purchase as I wanted one tool that did everything. When you are a young fellow starting out like I am, each investment must be finely calculated and carefully thought over.
